A New Engine Deep down, FIFA's most fundamental design philosophy is that of fluid, responsive play and EA are currently in the process of achieving that through an all-new engine. This new engine is being built on the EA DICE Frostbite engine and it will be powered by Frostbite 2. What this really means for FIFA is that the engine itself will be custom-built to integrate a variety of game physics features and social networking components. This is because FIFA is one of the few sports games to offer persistent online play. The ability to create better, more realistic games also enables FIFA to start introducing new gameplay features, such as player identification and even player models. For example, Madden NFL 11 famously had to abandon a plan to use player identification technology in order to keep the games running at a smooth 90 frames per second and an EA spokesperson has suggested that even FIFA 12 might be forsaking player identification in some of its football games. In FIFA 13, we were looking at a realistic approach to injury. We've taken this to the next level with our new injury system, which tries to take into account the impact of a tackle, the angle at which the player falls and the amount of time they spend on the ground in order to not only be more accurate, but also to allow the player to feel the impact of being hit. A New Experience For Fans New animations will give more personality to off the ball actions and replays. For example, a player will drop to the ground when taking a hard tackle, crumple under heavy pressure and be able to get back to their feet quickly after receiving medical attention. These improvements to animations will make it easier for players to act and react to the game. As part of the new engine, we've introduced a brand new match engine. With around 1.2 billion of the "soccer ball"-shaped matches now played in a FIFA world cup every year, we've designed a new match engine to deliver fast-paced, realistic match action. Players will be delivered a much more responsive and authentic experience. We've incorporated numerous small improvements to the engine, such as lower input lag, the ability to handle a huge number of players and also the ability to handle gameplay and animation with up to 6 seconds time to reaction. Additionally, we've added a new feature called "impact," which makes players move differently
