A: It's not illegal, but using serial numbers, key generators, or key-gens to crack software is. Are you on public computers? Are you running potential antivirus software? Are you running any sort of surveillance software? Are you running any sort of collection software, e.g. harvester software, an actual key logger, or a security/privacy relevant keylogger? If you suspect that any sort of software monitoring is currently taking place on your local network, you can also read more on the following site: Update: The program is certainly not illegal, however it is illegal to use a third party's work and/or to share it. I've seen the same thing on multiple occasions: a user program is cracked, and others make a few changes to it and claim the version to be their own work. This is usually done for ego purposes - it makes the cracked version look like it was made by them. The users who cracked the program probably didn't have the time or skill to create a true crack. Having their own program requires time and effort to improve on. It is comparable to what happens when a rapper raps a song he or she did not write, or when a person steals a dance and later does a poor parody of it. There is also the scenario of someone doing a phone interview on a local TV channel who claims to have developed this software. When the interviewer brings up the name of the first author who created the program, the author denies it. But the interviewer points out that the code is very similar to the author's program (which it is, but he didn't even write it). The author then claims that it's his version. These programs are illegal, but it's hard to prove it, so it can often go under the radar. A: I can't comment on legality of what you do here, but I can tell you with 100% certainty that your action is not OK. What you are doing is not simply illegal, it is actively harmful to individuals who are trying to use their computers in their own way. There are many techniques to be used to make a product more difficult to run. One of the most basic is 0cc13bf012
